Independent Senior Living Communities are also known as retirement communities, senior living communities, or independent retirement communities. They are designed for people age 55 and over.

These independent senior living facilities are priced at market rates and are designed to enable residents to live independently in a secure environment with access to supportive services. They also provide the opportunity to share common interests and activities with fellow residents. Occupancy by families with children may be discouraged. Units may be available for purchase or rent.

Housing type widely varies, including apartments, condominiums, single-family detached homes or townhouses, or villages. Some communities require an entrance or buy-in fee as well as monthly rent. These fees can be substantial. Most are non-refundable, while others will return fees upon the transfer of the unit to another qualified resident. Make sure that all the fine print is understood before signing a contract, and consult an elder law attorney if you have any questions.

Convenience services may include activities, transportation, emergency call systems, housekeeping, maintenance and meals in a communal dining room. Residents who need additional support may need to make their own arrangements for personal care, home health or other services.

Continuing Care Retirement Communities (CCRCs), usually licensed by the state, provide all three levels of care (independent living, assisted living and nursing home care) in a single setting. CCRCs offer older adults long-term contracts that guarantee a place to live and access to specified personal and health care services.

Residences may include apartments, townhouses, duplexes, clusters or single family homes. They offer differing degrees of service, usually including a common dining room, exercise and activity areas, outdoor recreation and swimming pool.

New residents are expected to move into the community when they are healthy and able to maintain an independent lifestyle, and may be asked to pay a sizable entry fee plus monthly maintenance fees. There may be the option of a month-to-month rental arrangement, or to purchase and develop equity in the property. Depending on the contract, specified health services may be covered by the entry fee, included in the maintenance fees, or paid for at the time of need. The monthly fee also covers meals, housekeeping, linen and personal laundry, utilities and other basic services.

Mary L. Wilson, Elder Law Attorney, suggests that you review the following when signing contracts for retirement housing:

1. Review the contract carefully. If possible, have it reviewed by an attorney. (Even if you think you understand the terms, you may be in error.)
2. Only what is printed in the contract is binding. If you are told anything that conflicts with the contract, ask for a letter verifying what you have been told. If a certain condition is important to you, ask for written clarification if the contract doesn't clearly say what you want.
3. If there is a lump-sum payment to buy into the unit, under what circumstances can you get the buy-in back? Can you get all or part of the buy-in back if you decide you do not like group housing? How long of a period are you allowed to decide if congregate housing is for you?
4. Can you get all or part of the buy-in back if you decide you do not like group housing? How long of a period are you allowed to decide if congregate housing is for you?
5. If part of the buy-in is returned at your death, how is it returned? Do you designate a beneficiary or does it become part of your estate?
6. If the housing unit offers "lifetime" care, these issues should be reviewed:
  - a) Lifetime care may not be guaranteed just because the housing unit has a large buy-in.
  - b) Who decides where care is provided? (i.e. your apartment, assisted living, infirmary)
  - c) If you are in the infirmary for long-term nursing care, how long can you also maintain your apartment?
  - d) Is there an appeal system if you disagree with a placement decision or don't want to give up your apartment?
  - e) What extra costs will arise if you cannot stay in your apartment?
7. In addition to the buy-in, there is a monthly payment due. (Statistically, these monthly payments have increased more rapidly than the annual inflation rate or the social security cost-of-living adjustment. Do you have sufficient cushion between your monthly income and the monthly payment?)
8. What happens if you can't meet the monthly payment? Do you lose the full buy-in if you move out because you can't make the monthly payment?
9. How solvent is the housing unit? How much does it have in reserve? How often has the management/ownership changed in the past 10 years? The Board of Directors is made up of at least 25 percent residents. These resident board members may be the best persons from whom to get this information.
10. If there is a long-term care part of the facility, can it offer care? If not, at whose cost do you receive higher levels of care at another facility?
